

I was waiting for that next adrenaline rush

Bill: I carried weapons all the time. And after I decided that academia was not going to be for me because I couldn't focus and study, I became a police officer at the Columbus Police Department. And for a while we rode black and white and then after a couple years, I became an undercover narcotics detective. Which was good for me because I carried as many guns as I could then. I mean I had guns everywhere.

In fact, I tell this story but it's not an embellishment, I had a weapon inside my refrigerator just in case somebody broke in and I would be able to get lucky. So, I was really out to lunch. I was waiting for that next adrenaline rush. I thought it was going to help me with my living vicariously. But actually, a policeman's job was fairly mundane and to me boring. So, I started my own executive protection company and moved to Los Angeles.
